Growing Up in Manhattan

When I was growing up, Manhattan was not very pleasant for African-Americans. I felt like an outsider at school, was shunned by the white students. We went to a segregated elementary school, Douglass School, located on Yuma St. When we went to the 7th Grade, we integrated without any preparation. It was culture shock. I've spent many years healing. I just went through 19 hours of training on Race & Social Justice at my job as a result of an innovative mayor who passed an initiative on the subject of race and has required all City workers to be trained. The training started with history from when race began and ended to today. I understand the why now, but it still stings.

High School Memories

I can only remember embarrassing moments. I remember being in choir and going to a competition in western KS. We stopped for lunch, but I had to sit on the bus alone and eat the lunch my Mother had prepared for me, because I was not allowed to go into the restaurant. I also remember being told I could not be in the operetta Brigadoon, presented by the choir and orchestra because, as Mr. Davidson put it, the parents decided there was no such thing as a black Scottish clan. However, he did tell us we could hand out programs. I remember Miss Kirkpatrick telling me to read a passage from a story because I would be able to speak and understand the so-called Negro dialect it was written in.
